The marten clan of Anishinaabe Ojibwe society fulfills a variety of roles. Marten is a hunter and provides for their communities, but in times of war they are also tasked with protection. When people are displaced from their clans through war, famine and other strife, Marten clans will adopt these individuals into their own. In this way, they teach us how to protect and defend each other and to look after one another. Marten shows us how to be fierce and how to stand up for others.

We depicted Marten alongside fire protection and law programs to illustrate the concept of defense for modern student life in Seneca.
